Handling Workplace Conflict

Workplace conflict is sometimes unavoidable. People have different opinions, working styles, and expectations. However, ignoring a conflict can allow tension to grow. It is better to deal with the problem early before it affects everyday work.

First, the people involved should talk together. They should choose a suitable time and place and give each person a chance to explain the situation. The aim is to focus on the problem, not to attack the other person or place blame on them.

Good communication also means listening carefully. People should listen without interrupting and ask questions when something is unclear. They may not agree with everything the other person says, but listening can help them understand a different point of view.

Next, they should try to find agreement. Even when people disagree, they can usually find something they have in common. This can help them agree on a solution and move forward.

Sometimes, a manager needs to provide guidance. An unbiased manager should not take sides but should help the people involved focus on the real problem and decide on the next steps.

Finally, resolving conflict requires people to forgive and move forward. A

Writing Activity

AI in Education: Progress or Problem?

You have read about the benefits and risks of AI in education. Write an opinion essay answering this question:

To what extent do you think AI will improve education?

Write 180–220 words. In your essay:

1. Discuss at least two benefits of AI in education.
2. Consider one potential disadvantage or concern.
3. Explain your own opinion clearly.
4. Give relevant examples to support your ideas.

Before you submit:

Organise your ideas into paragraphs. Use linking expressions and at least two comparative structures. Check your grammar, word choice and word count.
